

a+t makes you wonder but there are a few things we are certain of architecture cannot exist without the city and its citizens for 16 years we have searched for committed projects we are concerned about collective housing, about land occupation, about public spaces...

we spare no effort in visiting what we publish we don't criticise projects we analyse them

we publish a magazine without advertising when we have more to say, we make books still, our concerns are alike affordable housing, density, mixed uses, the privatisation of urban spaces...

a+t is internationally distributed independent of any editorial group quality? innovation? prestige?

it's up to our readers to choose the adjectives on our publications we distance ourselves more and more from self-centred buildings or rather is it the architects who are self-centred?

... at a+t we want to keep wondering.
